Excerpt: . . . no means the kind of work likely to invite a youthful mind, was eagerly devoured by her; Kousseaus Confessions, his Nouvelle Heloise, his simile, were all treated in the same fashion. The dignified and rather frigid character of the countess inspired her granddaughter with feelings of affection tempered with respect and almost veneration, whereas the simple and natural ways of Madame Dupin developed a boundless and profound love, which increased as years went by. As is the way with elderly people, the aged lady who, since the death of her beloved son, had directed all her powers of affection towards her Aurore, jealously watched the progress of her grand-daughters love for Madame Dupin. It seemed to her that she ought to possess the child's undivided love. These feelings often led to scenes between the countess and her daughter-in-law, and finally so obsessed the old...
